

Fukushima SAKE Key points

Brewing Kingdom Fukushima

Fukushima Prefecture is divided into three areas: Hamadori along the Pacific coast, Nakadori between the Ou Mountains and the Abukuma Highlands, and Aizu in the western part. Each of these areas has a very different climate and natural environment, and as a result, each region has produced a variety of specialty products, including sake. There are 56 sake breweries in Fukushima Prefecture, and each brewery competes with the others to produce unique, delicious, and easy-to-drink sake.

Characteristics of Fukushima sake

Three Aspects for Quality Sake

Good rice

Fukushima Prefecture is one of Japan's leading rice-producing regions, there are "Yume no Kaori" and "Fukunoka," which were developed as original sake rice varieties for making Japanese sake. Many sake breweries use these rice varieties to craft unique and flavorful Japanese sake.

Good water

80% of Japanese sake is composed of water. To create good sake, high-quality water is essential. The water from Fukushima Prefecture, created by its vast natural surroundings, is known to be soft in nature, making it easier to produce high-quality, clear, and slightly sweet sake.

Good producers (brewers)

Efforts are being made to improve the quality of Fukushima's sake through such initiatives as the "Sake Academy" for training young brewers, the "High-Quality Sake Study Group" for technical exchange among brewers, and the creation of a "Ginjo-shu Manual" that compiles the latest information on the brewery's own guiding policies and the latest brewing information.

Three Aspects of Flavor

Good taste with a fragrant aroma.

Light flavor
(Clear, refreshing)

Umami rich

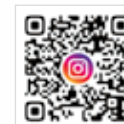

Rich umami and a clean sweetness of the original rice.
